

I HAVE SPOKEN AND SAVED MY SOUL: A QUALITATIVE ANALYSIS OF DISSENTING BEHAVIOUR OF CZECH CONSTITUTIONAL JUDGES

Gor Vartazaryan,* Štěpán Paulík1

Abstract: This paper presents a qualitative study on the dissenting behaviour of judges at the Czech Constitutional Court (CCC). It explores the motivations behind dissenting opinions, the impact of collegiality, and the role of unwritten rules and norms, particularly the ‘norm of consensus’. Through interviews with judges from the third decade of CCC (n=9), this study identifies three stances towards the norm of consensus that the CCC judges identify with: the hater, the fan and the strategist. The findings highlight four utilities motivating judges to dissent: previous experience, emotional vent, workload and importance of the case. Overall, this research contributes to a deeper understanding of judicial behaviour in the context of the CCC and offers insights for future research that is relevant to other constitutional courts operating within civil law traditions.

Keywords: Judicial Dissent, Dissenting Opinion, Separate Opinion, Judicial Decision-Making, Czech Constitutional Court.

INTRODUCTION

“I don’t like them [separate opinions].² (...) Because I am a routine judge and I am of the opinion that when a collegiate body makes a decision, a person X shouldn’t further comment on it, just because they were of a differing view. It is undermining the authority of that court.” The previous quote has been voiced by one of the Czech Constitutional Court („CCC”) judges. It expresses one of many possible stances a judge may take towards exercising their right to dissent that’s been shaped and influenced by their view of the role of a CCC judge and the CCC itself, a concept we later coin a norm-identification. The possible aspects influencing the judges’ decision whether to dissent or not are manifold and has encompassed political considerations,³ strategic considerations⁴ or institutional-systemic consideration.⁵

* JUDr. PhDr. Gor Vartazaryan, Ph.D. candidate at Faculty of Law Charles University in Prague, Prague, Czech Republic. ORCID: 0000-0002-0367-7274.

 Štěpán Paulík, Humboldt Universität zu Berlin, Berlin, Germany. ORCID: 0009-0007-6424-5209.

¹ This study was supported by Charles University Grant Agency, entitled “Polarization of the Third Constitutional Court: an analysis of the dissenting behaviour of constitutional judges”, no. 87124. The authors thank the two anonymous reviewers for their valuable comments and constructive suggestions, which helped improve the quality of this paper.

² In this paper, the term separate opinion (or simply dissent) is used to refer to both dissenting and concurring opinions. The decisive factor is not whether judge (or judges) disagree with the ruling or its reasoning, but whether they decide to express a different opinion publicly by publishing dissent.

³ HANRETTY, C. Judicial Disagreement need not be Political: Dissent on the Estonian Supreme Court. Europe-Asia Studies. Routledge, 2015, Vol. 67, No. 6. DOI: 10.1080/09668136.2015.1054260, pp. 3–4.

⁴ EPSTEIN, L., LANDES, W. M., POSNER, R. A. Why (And When) Judges Dissent: A Theoretical And Empirical Analysis. Journal of Legal Analysis. 2011, Vol. 3, No. 1.

⁵ GAROUPA, N., GRAJZL, P. Spurred by legal tradition or contextual politics? Lessons about judicial dissent from Slovenia and Croatia. International Review of Law and Economics. 2020, Vol. 63, p. 3.

This paper presents a qualitative study on the dissenting behaviour of judges of the CCC. Specifically, it asks how their dissenting behaviour has been shaped and influenced by their perception of the role of the CCC and by its institutional setup, as well as how judges interact with their peers during the process of drafting a separate opinion. To answer the research questions, we conducted and evaluated interviews with the judges of the third decade⁶ of the CCC.

We build on our previous research effort, which employed quantitative methods to test hypotheses generated mainly within the rational-choice theory and within the framework of the identification-disagreement model.⁷ In a quantitative large-n study, we found that there is not a strong norm of consensus operating at the CCC, that the disagreement potential of cases seems to be positively correlated with the dissenting behaviour of CCC judges, that the CCC judges adapt to their workload, and finally that the judges pay attention to collegiality costs a separate opinion may involve.⁸

In this study we choose depth over breadth.⁹ Therefore, our analysis is based on the third term of the CCC,¹⁰ between 2013–2023, since it was found that the third term of the CCC is rather polarized and that there are two voting blocs of judges that clash against each other in the plenary decisions.¹¹ We choose CCC for three main reasons: firstly, separate opinions are allowed at the CCC unlike at other Czech courts. Attaching a separate opinion is, however, not an obligation. The vote is not public, so if a judge votes against a decision but does not exercise the dissent, there is no way for the public to know that the judge voted against the majority. That opens room to strategize and potentially decide not to dissent despite their disagreement with the majority outcome. This phenomenon has been termed as dissent aversion in the empirical legal scholarship.¹² Previous interviews with CCC judges suggest that they do indeed exercise dissent aversion.¹³ Secondly, the CCC judges can dissent alone or in group with other judges. The circumstances under which judges decide for either option have not been thoroughly researched. The relevance of such research exceeds the CCC: joint dissents are also allowed at other apex courts such as the Supreme Court of the United States (“SCOTUS”). Lastly, it is hard to

⁶ It is common to refer to the Constitutional Court in ten-year periods – the first, second, and third decade – corresponding to the presidents who appointed its members. Since justices serve ten-year terms, the first decade is associated with Václav Havel, the second with Václav Klaus, and the third with Miloš Zeman.

⁷ PAULÍK, Š., VARTAZARYAN, G. Disagreement on a Bench: An Empirical Analysis of Dissent at the Czech Constitutional Court. European Journal of Empirical Legal Studies. 2024, Vol. 1, No. 2.

⁸ Ibid., p. 247–251.

⁹ GSCHWEND, T., SCHIMMELFENNIG, F. Introduction: Designing Research in Political Science – A Dialogue between Theory and Data. In: Thomas Gschwend – Frank Schimmelfennig (eds.). Research Design in Political Science: How to Practice What They Preach. London: Palgrave Macmillan UK, 2007.

¹⁰ The CCC was established in 1993 and judges are elected for 10 years.

¹¹ CHMEL, J. Co ovlivňuje Ústavní soud a jeho soudce? Praha: Leges, 2021; VARTAZARYAN, G. Síťová analýza disentujících ústavních soudců. Právník. 2022, Vol. 161, No. 12, pp. 1209–1213.

¹² EPSTEIN, L., LANDES, W. M., POSNER, R. A. The Behavior of Federal Judges: A Theoretical and Empirical Study of Rational Choice. In: The Behavior of Federal Judges. Harvard: Harvard University Press, 2013; POSNER, R. A. What Do Judges and Justices Maximize—(The Same Thing Everybody Else Does). Supreme Court Economic Review. 1993, Vol. 3.

¹³ KYSELA, J., BLAŽKOVÁ, K., CHMEL, J. Právnícký Olymp: portréty vybraných soudců Ústavního soudu ČR. Praha: Leges, 2015; SMEKAL, H. et al. Mimoprávní vlivy na rozhodování českého Ústavního soudu. Brno: Masaryk University Press, 2021, pp. 131–132.

capture certain features solely with quantitative methods. This paper also concerns the role of unwritten rules and customs, and it results in a typology of stances of judges towards a dissent rather than inference.

The paper proceeds as follows. In section 1, we situate our research in the existing theories of dissenting behaviour. In section 2, to give the reader sufficient context, we present back-ground information on the CCC and its judges. In section 3, we discuss the method we use to evaluate the interviews as well as how we conducted the interviews with the CCC judges. In section 4, we evaluate the interviews in light of our research questions. Section 5 opens the discussion where we juxtapose our qualitative findings with quantitative findings from literature review.

I. THEORIES OF DISSENTING BEHAVIOUR

Lee Epstein & Jack Knight argue that judges as “(1) social actors make choices in order to achieve certain goals, (2) social actors act strategically in the sense that their choices depend on their expectations about the choices of other actors, and (3) these choices are structured by the institutional setting in which they are made”.¹⁴ Instead of holding judges to pursue political policy oriented goals, the judges’ self-interest in terms of career progression, higher income, more leisure, or lesser workload takes the spotlight. In their empirical study on dissenting behaviour on the SCOTUS, Epstein, Landes, and Posner posit that “a potential dissenter balances the costs and benefits of issuing a dissenting opinion” and that judges have “leisure preferences, or, equivalently, effort aversion, which they trade off against their desire to have a good reputation and to express their legal and policy beliefs and preferences (and by doing so perhaps influence law and policy) by their vote, and by the judicial opinion explaining their vote, in the cases they hear.”

A dissonance between a proposed outcome for a case and any given judge’s preferences are eventually bound to happen. In such a case, the judge can either express their sincere preferences by writing a separate opinion or they can avert the dissent contrary to their personal beliefs. The decision of a judge faced with such a conflict whether to attach a separate opinion or whether to avert their dissent is then a function of multiple potential utilities.

However, these cannot be tested in most continental legal systems due to the lack of data on the voting of individual judges.¹⁵ Lack of data, however, is not the main difference between the continental and common legal traditions in the dissents. Kelemen builds the main differences between continental and common law tradition of dissent on the following four factors: (1) historical roots, (2) the importance of precedents, (3) the role of judges, and (4) the role of constitutional courts.¹⁶ Dissenting opinions have a long history in common law countries due to their oral hearing traditions, while in continental Europe, written proceedings made dissents rare. Precedents are crucial in common law systems, making dissents more influential, whereas in continental systems, they are mainly limited to apex courts. Common law judges actively shape the law, unlike their continental counterparts, who traditionally serve as interpreters of written law. Finally, constitutional courts in continental systems hold greater authority in constitutional review, making dissents more common and impactful in shaping constitutional interpretation and future case law.

¹⁴ EPSTEIN, L., KNIGHT, J. Toward a Strategic Revolution in Judicial Politics: A Look Back, A Look Ahead. Political Research Quarterly. SAGE Publications Inc., 2000, Vol. 53, No. 3, p. 626.

¹⁵ KELEMEN, K. Dissents and Other Separate Opinions. In: EPSTEIN, L. et al. (eds.). The Oxford Handbook of Comparative Judicial Behaviour. Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2024, pp. 549–550.

¹⁶ KELEMEN, K. Judicial Dissent in European Constitutional Courts: A Comparative and Legal Perspective. Abingdon-on-Thames: Routledge, 2017, pp. 78–83.

That said, in the European context, Caroline Wittig summarizes in her study on separate opinions at the Federal Constitutional Court of Germany the potential utilities for judges to attach a separate opinion and, thus, to acquire additional costs: (1) potential of impacting future caselaw, (2) moral obligation to distance oneself from a decision that contradicts her values, (3) to convey certain image about oneself.¹⁷ These motivations also largely rely on the self-perceived stance towards separate opinions in general. The proponents of separate opinions view dissenting positively based on the separate opinions being able to enrich the legal debate, being a sign of judicial independence, increasing the legitimacy of any given decision for it makes the decision more accurate of the real discussion behind it. The opponents of separate opinions mainly argue that showing the inability to speak in one voice undermines a court's legitimacy or the reputation of the dissenting judge. Such a view is perfectly in line with the quote from the introduction. Moreover, judges seeking the appreciation from the general public or legal community may act in their personal interests instead of in the court's interests. Lastly, separate opinions come at collegiality costs and may harm the mutual relationships of judges.

We now discuss partial findings from European research on potential utilities of judges to dissent. Hanretty argues that dissenting opinions at the Estonian Constitutional Court reflect not only the political preferences of the judges, but also different attitudes towards the applicants.¹⁸

Bentsen examined the increase in the proportion of dissenting opinions between 1990 and 1999 at the Norwegian Supreme Court. The proportion of dissent rose from 8% to 29%.¹⁹ He attributes this increase to a change in the leadership of the Norwegian Supreme Court with the election of President Carsten Smith, institutional reforms, and a change in the Court's agenda.²⁰ The main factor that triggered the dissent was the potential for cases to end up before the European Court of Human Rights.²¹

¹⁷ WITTIG, C. The Occurrence of Separate Opinions at the Federal Constitutional Court. Berlin: Logos Verlag, 2016, pp. 71–73.

¹⁸ HANRETTY, C. Judicial Disagreement need not be Political, pp. 17–18.

¹⁹ BENTSEN, H. L. Court Leadership, Agenda Transformation, and Judicial Dissent: A European Case of a “Mysterious Demise of Consensual Norms.” Journal of Law and Courts. 2018, Vol. 6, No. 1, p. 617.

²⁰ Ibid., The 1995 reform, which provided greater discretionary powers, allowed the court to focus on complex, substantial cases, which further contributed to the higher rate of dissents. In addition, the increasing diversity of the justices and the growing influence of international human rights law have exacerbated the divergence of views among the justices, which has resembled trends in other world supreme courts.

²¹ BENTSEN, H. L., MCKENZIE, M. J., SKIPLE, J. K. Explaining Dissent Rates on a Consensual Danish Supreme Court. Open Judicial Politics [online]. Oregon State University, 2021. In: Oregon State University [online]. [2024-04-23]. Available at: <<https://open.oregonstate.edu/open-judicial-politics/chapter/explaining-dissent-rates/>>.

In a comparative analysis of the Slovenian and Croatian Constitutional Court, Garoupa et al. concluded that partisan fractionalization may be an important predictor of dissent given the specific legal tradition.²² Surprisingly, in this study, neither the workload of the court nor the size of the court panel, which is emphasized by the authors from the American setting, has a statistically significant effect on dissent.

Results of a comparative study on the Constitutional Courts in Germany, the Czech Republic, Poland, Slovakia and Latvia, show that higher rates of dissent occur among judges who have prior professional experience in the academy alongside the judiciary.²³ Further, legal complexity of cases and the characteristics of the plaintiff (petitioner) are other factors affecting the likelihood of dissent. In our study, we pose the research question:

I.1 RQ1: What utilities motivate the CCC judges to dissent or not to dissent?

Wittig introduces a non-formal model of dissenting behaviour, the identification-disagreement model. The model is made up of two dimensions: the disagreement level and judges' stance and degree of self-identification of their role as a judge, termed as norm of consensus. Separate opinions are then a function of a judge's identification with the norm of consensus and the level of disagreement of judges.²⁴ Gregory A. Calderia & Christopher J. W. Zorn define a norm as "a long-run equilibrium outcome, which underpins the interaction between individuals and reflects common understandings as to what is acceptable behaviour in given circumstances".²⁵ The norm of consensus in turn defines the level of dissent that is acceptable at any given court.²⁶ Wittig's argument is two-fold. First, in civil law traditions unlike its US counterpart, the prevailing notion of the norm of consensus is that a court should not display disagreement. Second, the extent of adherence to the norm varies among judges.²⁷ However, the first part of this argument does not apply to the Czech Republic. The experience of the communist regime led to the introduction of separate opinions, which were viewed as a way to protect the personal integrity of individual judges.²⁸ By examining the norm of consensus, we will explore how judges of the Czech Constitutional Court perceive the tolerance of dissent as a potentially delegitimizing factor for the court.

²² GAROUPA, N., GRAJZL, P. Spurred by legal tradition or contextual politics? Lessons about judicial dissent from Slovenia and Croatia. International Review of Law and Economics. 2020, Vol. 63.

²³ BRICKER, B. Breaking the Principle of Secrecy: An Examination of Judicial Dissent in the European Constitutional Courts. Law & Policy. 2017, Vol. 39, No. 2, pp. 185–186.

²⁴ WITTIG, C. The Occurrence of Separate Opinions at the Federal Constitutional Court, pp. 74–75.

²⁵ CALDERIA, G. A., ZORN, C. J. W. Of Time and Consensual Norms in the Supreme Court. American Journal of Political Science. [Midwest Political Science Association, Wiley]. 1998, Vol. 42, No. 3, pp. 876–877.

²⁶ NARAYAN, P. K., SMYTH, R. The Consensual Norm on the High Court of Australia: 1904–2001. International Political Science Review. SAGE Publications Ltd., 2005, Vol. 26, No. 2; WITTIG, C. The Occurrence of Separate Opinions at the Federal Constitutional Court, p. 75.

²⁷ WITTIG, C. The Occurrence of Separate Opinions at the Federal Constitutional Court, p. 75.

²⁸ VENICE COMMISSION. Report on separate opinions of constitutional courts. p. 21. In: Council of Europe [online]. 17. 12. 2018 [2025-10-10]. Available at: < https://www.venice.coe.int/webforms/documents/default.aspx?pdffile=CDL-AD\(2018\)030-e030-e)>.

I.2 RQ2: How do the CCC judges understand and identify with the norm of consensus at the CCC?

Epstein, Landes, and Posner address the issue of collegiality costs arising for a dissenting judge: “The effort involved in these revisions, and the resentment at criticism by the dissenting judge, may impose a collegiality cost on the dissenting judge by making it more difficult for him to persuade judges to join his majority opinions in future cases”²⁹. Based on this theory, they predict and indeed empirically confirm that “dissents will be less frequent in circuits that have fewer judges because any two of its judges will sit together more frequently and thus have a greater incentive to invest in collegiality”³⁰. In the CCC context, collegiality plays one more important role. The judges may exercise a solitary or a joint dissent. The latter carries with itself the utility of a division of labor at the cost of having to reach a compromise with other dissenters. This dynamic is further influenced by the introduction of 3-member chamber rotations, a feature of the CCC’s institutional structure to which we now turn.

II. DISSENTS AT THE CZECH CONSTITUTIONAL COURT

The CCC consists of fifteen judges, out of which one is the president of the CCC, two are vice presidents and twelve associate judges.³¹ These fifteen judges are appointed by the president of the Czech Republic upon approval of the Senate, the upper chamber of the Czech two-chamber Parliament. The judges enjoy 10 years terms with the possibility of re-election; there is no limit on the times a judge can be re-elected.

From the perspective of the inner organization, the CCC can decide in four bodies: (1) individual judges in the role of judge rapporteur, (2) 3-member chambers (senáty), (3) the plenum (plénium), and (4) special disciplinary chamber. The 3-member chambers and the plenum play a crucial role. The plenum is composed of all judges, whereas the four 3-member chambers are composed of the associate judges. Until 2016, the composition of the chambers was static. However, in 2016, a system of regular 2-yearly rotations was introduced, wherein the president of the chamber rotates to a different every 2 years.

A judge rapporteur plays a crucial role.³² Each case of the CCC gets assigned to a judge rapporteur. The assignment is regulated by a case allocation plan. They are tasked with drafting the opinion, about which the body then votes. The president of the CCC (in plenary cases) or the president of the chamber (in chamber cases) may re-assign a case to a different judge rapporteur if the draft opinion by the original judge rapporteur did not receive a majority of votes. Unfortunately, the CCC does not keep track of these reassignments.

²⁹ EPSTEIN, L., LANDES, W. M., POSNER, R. A. Why (And When) Judges Dissent, pp. 3–4.

³⁰ Ibid.

³¹ KOSAŘ, D., VYHNÁNEK, L. The Constitutional Court of Czechia. In: Armin von Bogdandy – Peter Huber – Christoph Grabenwarter (eds.). The Max Planck Handbooks in European Public Law: Volume III: Constitutional Adjudication: Institutions. pp. 128–130 In: SSRN [online]. 12. 3. 2020 [2024-03-23]. Available at: <<https://papers.ssrn.com/abstract=3634604>>.

³² CHMEL, J. Zpravodajové a senáty: Vliv složení senátu na rozhodování Ústavního soudu... České republiky o ústavních stížnostech. Časopis pro právní vědu a praxi. 2017, Vol. 25, No. 4.; HOŘEŇOVSKÝ, J., CHMEL, J. Proces vzniku rozhodnutí Ústavního soudu ČR. Časopis pro právní vědu a praxi. 2015, Vol. 23, No. 3.

The act on the CCC allows for separate opinions. They can take two forms: dissenting or concurring opinions. Each judge has the right to author a separate opinion, which then gets published with the CCC decision. It follows that not every anti-majority vote implies a separate opinion, it is up to the judges to decide whether they want to attach a separate opinion with their vote. Vice-versa, not every separate opinion implies an anti-majority vote, as the judges can attach a concurring opinion. In contrast to dissenting opinion, when a judge attaches a concurring opinion, they voted with the majority but disagree with its argumentation. Unfortunately, it is difficult to conduct research on the dissent aversion because the voting is kept secret. However, it opens the possibility to examine why judges dissent alone or together. Judges can dissent both in chambers or plenary decisions.

It is important to note that a separate opinion in the 3-member chamber decisions almost at all time reveals that the vote was split. Out of 90154 3-member chamber decisions, 94.09 % result in inadmissibility, in which a unanimous vote is required. An inadmissibility decision entails only a quasi-meritorious review that results into the conclusion that a case does not contain a question of constitutional law. A rejection already entails review on merits. It follows that if one of the judges decides to dissent in the 3-member chamber, the decision has to be made on merits, which further makes it legally more binding, and the judge rapporteur is typically forced to change the structure of the decision and make the argumentation more comprehensive. This further disincentivizes separate opinions in the 3-member chamber proceedings as the decision to dissent turns a non-binding decision containing a majority opinion, with which the dissenting judges disagrees, into a binding decision on merits and it imputes large effort costs on the judge rapporteur.

Figure 1: The percentage of plenary decisions containing at least one separate opinion out of all the plenary decisions that have been made from 1993–2023.

The room for the dissenting judge and the majority to address each other differs between the two bodies. There is less back and forth interplay between the judges, more akin to the SCOTUS context. Most of the communication is handled remotely in the chamber proceedings, whereas the plenum meets regularly to discuss the cases in person. Despite that, from the perspective of the procedure, the process of generating separate opinions is the same. In both cases, the rapporteurs are informed about the outcome of the vote, which is filed in the voting record. The separate opinion is then sent to the judge rapporteur before the decision is announced, as it cannot be added until after the announcement. It is important to note that judges have the possibility, not the obligation, to dissent. In other words, there is room for judges to give way to strategic considerations.

III. METHOD AND DATA

To answer our research questions, we conducted semi-structured interviews, “a qualitative data collection strategy in which the researcher asks informants a series of predetermined but open-ended questions”³³, with judges of the third decade of the CCC.

A written interview guide with a list of questions divided into these four topics to be covered was developed in advance in accordance with the literature review: 1) the process of creating a dissent, 2) attitude towards dissents, 3) dissents in plenary decisions, and 4) dissents in senate decisions. We contacted all 15 CCC judges, out of which 9 agreed to participate in the research, 2 refused to participate and the rest did not respond to our repeated requests.

Due to the need to maintain the anonymity of the interviewees, it is not possible to reveal the individual judges who participated in the interviews. However, as the sample consisted of 9 from the total of 15 judges, we can confirm that judges from a range of attitudes towards dissent (both supporters and opponents of dissent) were represented, as well as those with different career backgrounds (former academics, attorneys, career judges, etc.).

Neither the questions nor the topics were sent to the judges in advance. However, they were informed that the research would focus on dissenting opinions at the third term of the CCC. The interviewee provided interviews with the condition of subsequent anonymization and approval. None of the judges took the right to change their quotations used in this paper. Thereby, all quotes cited in this paper are authentic and have been translated from Czech into English. To unify anonymity, we present quotes from all interviewees in plural.

Once informed consent was obtained from the participants, interviews were conducted by one of the authors in an office of individual judges directly in the building of the CCC located in Brno from July 2023 to August 2023. The interviews took 50 minutes on average and were held in Czech language. All the interviews followed the same topic structure and there were no questions that the judges refused to answer.

The interviews were recorded, transcribed verbatim, and analyzed using the ATLAS.ti software kit. Thematic analysis, “a method for identifying, analyzing and reporting patterns (themes) within data”³⁴, was used to organize and describe the dataset. The authors coded the interviews and consolidated codes into several content domains using the inductive approach. Due to the judges’ request to remain anonymous, the results cannot be shared.

³³ GIVEN, L. M. The SAGE Encyclopedia of Qualitative Research Methods. Thousand Oaks: SAGE Publications, 2008.

IV. INTERVIEWS EVALUATION

We now separately discuss themes that appeared in the interviews. Firstly, we delve into the process of how a separate opinion comes about. While there are some formal rules, over time, informal habits and unwritten rules have developed. Secondly, we analyze the various stances that the judges take towards dissent.

IV.1 The birth of dissent at CCC

Although the procedure at the CCC is governed by the act on the CCC, it is important to map the internal process that takes place before the CCC decides to explore the potential room that judges have to break away from the majority. We discuss the chamber and the plenary proceedings somewhat separately. We start with the former. First of all, when a case arrives at CCC a judge rapporteur is randomly assigned. The judge rapporteur mostly prepares the draft of the court decision after some familiarization with the file and sends it to their colleagues for further discussion. The judge rapporteur then discusses the case with other judges. The style of communication in chambers depends on prior agreement. Some of the judges prefer to meet in person, while others communicate per e-mail. Some judges prefer a more personal approach rather than e-mail communication. However, when the case is complicated or something is problematic one of the judges may suggest a meeting in person.

“E-mail correspondence at the beginning, followed by a phase when the colleagues you have approached are asked to express themselves. So they’ll respond electronically again, actually send the draft back after editing, and some will ask for in-person meetings. If that doesn’t settle the matter, then the three-judge chamber will meet all together.”

Judges present their opinion during the deliberation. It is in this phase that an idea of a dissent comes about, if one of the judges decides to break away from the majority opinion. Although the judges come prepared for the deliberation, it is unlikely that the decision of dissent had already been made prior to it. Furthermore, a separate opinion in the 3-member chamber decisions presents an interesting paradox: as explained one of the interviewees, the costs of a dissent in the chamber proceedings are very high since it forces the judge rapporteur to do more work and since it transforms the decision into a binding ruling:

“If the judge rapporteur proposes a decision on inadmissibility, and I disagree, I will force the judge rapporteur to invite the parties to make a statement, others to reply...”

³⁴ BRAUN, V., CLARKE, V. Using thematic analysis in psychology. Qualitative Research in Psychology. Routledge, 2006, Vol. 3, No. 2, p. 79.

I feel obliged to write the dissent for the sake of it and not to let everything wear down the judge rapporteur, who suddenly has a lot more work to do, and so in that case I feel obliged to also spit out some idea and explain to some extent why the ruling is being made by way of a judgment.”

It is not only the collegiality cost that judges consider in the chamber proceedings. Strategic considerations also come into play since the dissent can transform from a non-binding decision to a binding judgment. A non-binding decision on inadmissibility requires unanimous vote. Therefore, voting against the majority and exercising a dissent turns the non-binding majority opinion into a binding opinion contained in a decision on merits:

“It’s just that in some cases, I’ve made, and I’ll say this as a frankly strategic consideration. When you exercise a dissent in the chamber, you make a denial of a resolution that is not intended to preclude a binding denied finding. So I was making strategic consideration that it was better to have the case rejected on inadmissibility than to be rejected on merits.”

Interestingly, the strategizing judges also consider with whom they sit on the bench. The rotation of judges at the CCC was introduced in 2016. Since then, once every two years, one member of a chamber “rotates” into another. One of the judges revealed that they strategically wanted to resolve the case with the current composition, as the judges considered those more prominent in the legal community and cared about the academic impact of the case:

“...so actually by passing the decision in the more difficult chamber and gaining support from my colleagues, had a lot more public legitimacy.”

After signing the voting protocol, the judge rapporteur waits for and collects separate opinions and then announces the case.

The situation in plenary cases is quite different: plenary sessions are mandatory in person and planned on every Tuesday. If a judge rapporteur wants to discuss their case at a plenary meeting, they have to send the draft of the decision, including facts of the case and their proposed outcome, per e-mail a week before the planned plenary session. This is an unwritten rule, which is respected by the judges:

“There is a sort of friendly rule that if you want your case to be discussed in the plenary meeting on Tuesday, you have to send it by 12:00 on the previous Tuesday and give your colleagues a week. If it’s something more complicated it is better to send it up 14 days before the meeting or so... and then of course it’s up to the President of the CCC who sets up the plenary.”

After the judge rapporteur sends their draft, some of the judges may react to the draft by sending their comments and any suggestions to that particular case. At this stage, the potential dissenting groups for the joint dissents are already starting to take shape:

“Usually it’s the judge who has some reservations before the plenary session and writes out in advance what their reservations are and sends them out to everybody else becomes the leader of the dissenting group and then most people tend to sort of join in and possibly write something of their own here and that’s sort of the way that the group is formed. Whoever starts dissenting.”

One of the judges explained how they perceive “opinion leaders” within these dissenting groups. It is not by any means that the “opinion leaders” are always the same judges. Opinion leaders, as they were described by our respondent, are willing to invest their free time in preparing and commenting on the cases of others:

“Yeah, just type-wise and personality-wise you’re going to have a judge who likes to debate more, who likes to argue, who doesn’t resist, who always like goes into that opinion clash and then you’re always going to have a judge who listens to that and then some even maybe join in or be persuaded. Which, of course, within that 15-member body, you have to have both groups of judges because if you have 15 opinion leaders, you’re never going to have anything like a decision there. If you have 14 submissive judges who just vote according to the opinion leader, you’re going to have a monocratic CCC.”

Some of the judges argue that opinion leaders are selected based on their expertise in certain area of law. For example, in a criminal case, a judge who has previous experience in criminal law will be more forthcoming. Some of our respondents presented themselves as opinion leaders, since they consider it their duty to always speak up when they disagree with the majority opinion. It can happen that the opinion leader will arise during the debate at the plenary meeting. It is not a rule that opinion leaders are only those who comment on the case in advance. The voting coalitions are also emerging at this point. The judges agree that they can infer from the debate, even before the voting, how other judges will vote since most of the judges present their opinion or at least announce with whom they agree:

“So of course if there is a professor of criminal law in the plenary session and it is a matter that, for example, can repeal part of the Criminal Code you know that the factual influence of the particular professor is higher, because after all, its their specialization.”

“And then my experience is that after voting, when I know that four colleagues vote against the judgment like me, I always offer them: do you want to sign my dissent or not?”

However, there are some exceptions, under which the judges do not speak up and only then quietly announce that they will express themselves in a separate opinion. But that happens rarely in exceptional situations. After the debate, if the chamber president finds that the case has been sufficiently discussed, he will open the vote. The unwritten rule is that judges at this stage will definitely confirm whether they will dissent or not. In the plenary proceedings, the situation is different:

“In plenary matters, of course, the situation is different and there is an unwritten rule, that a dissenting opinion must be invoked at the latest when the voting record is signed.”

In the case of dissent, it is necessary to give dissenters enough time to write their separate opinion. In practice, judges are usually given a week to write the dissent:

“Yes, and again, we don’t have any rules of procedure, but [...], the decision is generally published at the same time as the dissent, so that there is a practice of about one week between the adoption of the decision and its publication, including the preparation and publication of the separate opinion.”

After the vote, it is decided when the case will be announced. The dissenters should have enough time to write the dissent. A curious case occurred in the case of the repeal of the law on elections to the Chamber of Deputies Pl. US 44/17. This case was mentioned by all of our nine interviewees. The problem that arose was that the case was withheld by the judge rapporteur for three-years before issuing the final decision. After the vote, however, the president of the CCC decided that the case will be announced the next day, since it repealed part of the law eight months before the elections to the Chamber of Deputies. The dissenting judges criticized the lack of time given to them. That then led to new agreement between judges that a week should be guaranteed at minimum for writing a dissent.

A judge rapporteur may lose their case. In that scenario, the chairman put the case forward to the “most convincing opinion leader” (who got the most votes) that becomes judge rapporteur. In this case, the judge rapporteur may use their rejected draft as a basis for dissent and the opinion leader of the dissent group becomes the new judge rapporteur.

“It may be that those comments will convince the majority of the plenary to change the decision and also the rapporteur-judge, and therefore you will very likely be the new rapporteur, because the president will assume that you are prepared for this, since you presented all the arguments. You’ve probably already thought this through like you’ve been working on it.”

To sum up, we identify these types of judges during the coalition making of a decision: (1) an original judge rapporteur, (2) opinion leaders(s), (3) president of the CCC (who presides over a session of the court) and (4) the remaining judges who join in the opinion of either judge rapporteur or one of the opinion leaders, or they express their own opinion, which no one joins. After the vote, the opinion leaders become dissent leaders or in case of a change of judge rapporteur the opinion leader becomes the new judge rapporteur, while the old judge rapporteur may become the dissenting leader. After the vote, dissent leader(s) ask other colleagues whether they want to join. Most of the judges perceive joint dissent as an advantage.

“I am of the opinion that the dissents are stronger and more understandable if the judges, who share the same opinion, write it jointly. I think it should be done in such a way that they process it together, precisely so that everyone projects a part of their own sub-argument. It is much more understandable for the public and experts rather than having 6 separate dissents.”

However, even here we can spot some exceptions.

Researcher: and has it ever happened to you that maybe a judge wanted to have a solitary dissent and didn't want to invite you? Interviewee: Yeah as far as I recall there was a situation like that with one of the judges.

After deciding who will write with whom the dissent, the judges get down to writing. The judges perceive greater literary freedom in the possibility of a solitary dissent, which aligns with the finding of Tom S. Clark & Benjamin Lauderdale that separate opinions correspond the most to the political position of SCOTUS judges.³⁵ Joint dissents are most often written by the dissent leader. The remaining judges in the dissenting coalition mainly comment on it or make suggestions. In a few cases, there has also been joint writing of dissents (each writing a specific portion).

“Sometimes there is simply such a time pressure that I rely on other judges to express their opinion in the dissent. And then I join their dissent.”

Researcher: “How does the arrangement for writing joint dissents take place?”

Interviewee: “This happens in such a way that basically the judge who is the most active writes the dissent. And then, from my experience, the practice is that when they then write a dissent and four colleagues voted alike, they are usually offered, at least I always offer if they would like to sign the dissent. You can recognize the main author of the dissent by the order of the names in the dissent.”

IV.2 The fan, hater and strategist

In the interviews, we were able to identify three overarching types of attitude towards dissent among judges: the fan, the hater and the strategist. The main difference between these three groups lies in the degree of their norm-identification, or their internal attitude on how the court should act externally, thus answering our second research questions. Judges identify themselves as a member of one of those three groups. Haters of dissent argue that the CCC should not outwardly appear disunited by any dissents and instead should try to appear as united and unanimous as possible. These judges adhere to the norm of consensus to full extent. It is possible to find dissents even from the haters. They differ in the degree of disagreement required for them to dissent: simply put a hater needs a much greater degree of disagreement on a bench to exercise dissent, whereas the threshold of the fans is lower, since a disunited court externally is not perceived as a major problem - on the contrary, they perceives the plurality of opinions positively. Strategists are somewhere in the middle of both these views. They are neither completely open to dissent nor completely closed to it. Simply put, they dissent where it strategically suits them. We now present an example for each type and then delve deeper into each type.

³⁵ CLARK, Tom S., LAUDERDALE, B. Locating Supreme Court Opinions in Doctrine Space. American Journal of Political Science, 2010, 54, no. 4: 871-90.

An example of a hater: “I don’t like them (dissents). [...] I believe that when a decision is taken by a majority, it is not to comment further on some B that someone thought otherwise.”

An example of a fan: “I’m a big fan of dissent [...] And I can safely say that so far, I’ve been on the CCC for many years now, I’ve dissented every time I’ve voted no. It’s a sign of fairness to explain even outwardly why I didn’t support the majority opinion here.”

An example of a strategist: “I think that dissent makes sense if one expresses a fundamental position or a fundamental opinion. I am motivated by a different legal opinion or the hope that it may lead to a change in either case law or legislation in the future.”

Indeed we are aware that these three types are a simplified model that does not explain all the variance in the dissenting behaviour at the CCC. Even the judges from the group of those who don’t like dissent, dissent in some cases. There is not a single judge without a dissent at CCC. One of the factors that could explain that is the previous profession of constitutional judge. When the CCC judge is coming from the ordinary court system, they are not used to dissent unless they were a judge at the Supreme Court or Supreme Administrative Court for only the SAC allows for dissents under specific and narrow circumstances, otherwise judges in Czechia are not legally allowed to attach separate opinions. For a career judge one of the main aspects of judicial decision-making is to create legal certainty for the public. A dissenting opinion, from their point of view, undermines this certainty.

“Basically, from my point of view, it undermines the authority of the court to some extent. It was simply decided by majority vote, period.”

So how is it possible that even these judges sometimes exercise a dissent? In one response, two factors played a large role for the decision to overcome their aversion towards dissenting: 1) a high level of disagreement and 2) the possibility to join the dissent of another judge who shares a similar view. One of the judges explained to us:

“Whether it’s a value... so yeah I made an agreement with a colleague who felt the need to write the dissent. I would read it to consider whether or not to join.”

Furthermore judges who like to dissent and dissent as much as possible have different reasons why they do so. They manage to dissent every time that they vote against the majority opinion. However, that does not imply that they are always the authors of the dissents, since it would be nearly impossible due to time management and the amount of workload at the CCC. It’s almost as if the option to explain their differing view is perceived as an obligation:

Interviewee: “It may not be a legal obligation, but I feel it’s my professional obligation to write a dissent; from a legal standpoint it is a judge’s possibility not a duty, but I feel it’s an ethical duty for a judge to always write a dissent if they vote no.”

Interviewee: “It should simply be the principle that a judge reveals what they were against.”

To answer our first research question, we identified four main aspects (motivations) that explain CCC judges' decision to dissent: 1) previous experience, 2) emotional valve, 3) caseload and 4) importance of the case. Previous experience, caseload, as well as the importance of the case were tested in our quantitative analysis.³⁶ We found that higher workload lowers the probability of dissent, also we found that the more legally complex or controversial the case, the more likely a judge is to dissent. Our empirical findings however didn't find a relation between previous experience and dissents. However the quantitative findings have certain limitations, as many CCC judges have combined several professions (judiciary, advocacy, academia) in their previous careers or even changed them over time. Finally the need to release emotions has not been thematized to our knowledge in the literature on dissenting behaviour and presents a new finding. Now we will present judges' perspectives on the motivation behind each aspect.

IV.2.1 Previous experience

The CCC as an apex court represents for a share of Czech lawyers the pinnacle of their careers. The President of the Czech Republic nominates candidates for CCC judges and the Senate approves them. As a rule, the president should nominate as diverse a constitutional court as possible - they seek diversity not only in terms of gender but also in terms of profession. The CCC judges have in the past encompassed academics, lawyers, but also judges of higher and lower courts. The professional background of CCC judges shapes their stance and views towards the role and functioning of the CCC and it also influences the familiarity among CCC judges - some have already met at a district court or at a department at university, some of them don't know each other. That opens up an interesting dynamic that develops over time as the newly appointed judges have to get accustomed to their new position as well as to their new colleagues:

“Often those social relationships come from some previous work - I don't know, I know some of my colleagues from the university department.”

One interviewee revealed that judges perceive the previous profession of their colleagues and at the same time transfer their knowledge from the former profession to the current one.

Interviewee: “Then an academic comes along at CCC and they are used to writing academic papers and that's a bit different than writing judgments or dissent. In an academic paper you're completely free, you can just write whatever you want and you're the only signed under it and it actually influences the academic discussion, but it doesn't directly affect people's fates.”

Interviewee: “Many colleagues see the judgment as some kind of scientific work. For me, as a common judge, it's a judgment... the basis of judicial work is to respect the majority ruling. If the majority outvotes me, I obey and secondly, it is equally basic to judicial work to respect the binding legal opinion of a higher authority.“

³⁶ PAULÍK, Š., VARTAZARYAN, G. Disagreement on a Bench, pp. 247–251.

Interviewee: “Obviously, for example, if somebody is not a judge and now they’re actually judging here for the first time, it’s a bit of a problem for them to learn the procedures at a court.”

There are three additional sub-themes that surfaced during our interviews and that we believe deserve further inquiry that is beyond the scope of our paper. First, it appears that judges from lower courts are less likely to dissent since they are used to the binding nature of the decision of an appellate court and at the same time they are more aware of the aspect of undermining the authority of the court by dissent. Since this is very difficult to verify quantitatively in the Czech context, because the number of judges from non-supreme courts is minimal, the in-depth interviews suggest that that may indeed be the case:

“Because I was a routine judge I believe that if a decision was made by a majority, no one should further comment further on some other solutions or that he thought otherwise.”

Secondly, it appears that the judges who come from the Supreme Court and Supreme Administrative Court perceive this aspect differently as they come from a court at the top of the hierarchy. Moreover, judges at higher court have the power to determine what direction the case law should take, while lower court judges must learn to obey the higher courts. That situation was described by one of our respondents as follows:

“If you’re asking about the judicial career, it’s related to the fact that as you grow to the higher levels, then of course you’re more interested in influencing the jurisprudence with your judgments”

Lastly, it appears that judges with background in the academia and without experience as a judge have the ambition to take on an academic dimension in the decision/judgment. At the same time, one can also expect more freedom in the writing of dissents:

“Academics have it differently. They’re able to sort of overlook the verdict and have the ambition to sort of show like in the judicial opinion or in the dissents, express ideas beyond the court’s decision.”

IV.2.2 Emotional vent

Every interviewee touched upon the topic of emotions and frustration resulting from a plenary or chamber discussion. A portion of the CCC judges admitted that frustration sometimes leads them to writing a separate opinion. Dealing with emotions has proven to be an important aspect of their stance towards dissents. In a fundamental disagreement, a judge does not need to bottle up their emotions but they can just vent them out through dissent.

Researcher: “So if I may start – what is the meaning of a written dissent for you?”

Interviewee: “It’s a kind of relief when we don’t agree, for example, on the reasoning — it’s a safety valve so that we can all work together.”

The CCC judges agreed that a highly emotionally charged separate opinion is more readily and easily written alone than together with others because a solitary separate opinion does not have to be approved by anyone else:

“Honestly when you write it yourself you are making less compromises.”

Some judges revealed that they do not experience the need to vent emotions. Interestingly, those who do not experience such frustrations reminisced about their previous judicial careers:

“I’d have to hang myself if I was that emotional in the judiciary system. Of course, when I was young and stupid, the court of appeal dismissed some of my cases. So I read it and wrote it like they wanted from me, period.”

Interesting research questions emerge from the interviews: To what extent is the dissenting behaviour influenced by the perceived role of dissents as an avenue for venting emotions? What factors influence the variance of the role of emotions venting through a dissent? To our knowledge, such a question has not been thoroughly empirically researched and opens up an interesting research avenue. Does it depend on the previous professional experience as some interviewees seem to hint? We present a couple of fragments that enlighten this aspect of a dissent. It follows from the interviews that emotions may lead to strong personal expressions in dissent. Most held the view that dissent should not interfere on a personal level and argued that that would be strictly unethical and unprofessional:

Researcher: “You said that it can improve the relationships in that court, and often there are dissents that seem to me to attack the judge rapporteur rather than the the decision itself.”

Interviewee: “I’ll stop you there, that’s a total ethical mistake. You don’t write dissent at all by saying what they did was wrong. Dissent to me is always offering a different way of dealing with it. I mean, I’ve never, I don’t think any dissent of mine has ever been as impolite, because I’ve actually just offered an alternative solution. And even I’ve avoided that sort of “my colleagues are a disappointment to me” and so on and so on, maybe at some point like that, but it’s certainly not what I was primarily writing, but just that maybe I was joining someone.”

But some defended opposite approach with the following argument:

“Someone said that simply the dissent is lost. Yeah I just failed to get a majority for my arguments, but when there is a loss it should be as fair. So I recognize that if it’s not fair, there’s an opportunity to argue back on a more personal level.”

Those judges simply feel that a procedural injustice was done against them; that the only way to draw attention to this issue is to write a separate opinion that is intended to inform the public of some injustice that has taken place in the Constitutional Court. Therefore, a less calculated, less strategic dimension of the emotional plane emerges. To the best of our knowledge, no previous empirical study on dissenting behaviour has considered this dimension.

IV.2.3 Workload

The importance of leisure and workload was already discussed in the theory of dissent. The question remains how is the role of workload perceived by individual judges at CCC? The haters of dissent are more likely to spend time on their cases rather than writing dissent. In contrast to that, the fans of dissent are more likely to ignore their workload. The strategists weigh and decide whether they can afford to dissent regarding the amount of caseload he is dealing with at the moment.

A hater: “Well, I don’t have time to write dissents and stuff like that (laughs).” A fan: „I dissent every time.” A strategist: “If I’m against it but it’s not worth a dissent, either because I don’t consider it so fundamental, or that or just for completely prosaic reasons that I just don’t have the time.”

We therefore reveal that the typically researched effect of workload may vary across certain clusters of judges. To our knowledge this heterogeneity of the effect has not been studied at all. Our interviews therefore open another potential research avenue.

Furthermore, we revealed a collegiality effect regarding caseload. The CCC judges take into account whether their dissent imputes extra work on the judge rapporteur. Extra work can be a situation, in which the judge rapporteur is forced to rewrite an inadmissibility decision to a judgment as the law requires the admissibility decisions to be unanimous. Another situation occurs when a dissent causes delays in the proceedings. The dissenting judge tries as much as possible to convince the judge-reporter of their view, which ultimately delays the entire process of the decision-making and subsequent announcement of the judgment. Such time delays, which can lead to an increase in the workload of both judges, lead the dissenting judge to exercise dissent as their reputation among their colleagues could suffer.

“If I force the judge-rapporteur to rewrite an inadmissibility decision I feel obliged to write the dissent just for the sake of it. He suddenly has far more work, and in that case I feel obliged to explain to a certain extent why I chose to vote differently than the majority.”

The collegiality and effort costs also come into play in joint separate opinions. Some judges admitted to having been agreed in advance to take turns writing dissents when voting together or they simply ask each other to write the separate opinion for time reasons. Long-term joint dissenting collaborations arise from frequent forms of voting and consensus.³⁷

“We decided who would write the dissent and then we communicated among ourselves and sent it to the other judges. We took the comments into account, so like then it was a collective work, but like every text, somebody just has to write the basis.”

³⁷ VARTAZARYAN, G. Síťová analýza disentujících ústavních soudců.

IV.2.4 Importance of the case

There is not a single judge of CCC with zero separate opinions. Table 1 reveals the number of times that the 3rd term CCC judges exercised the dissent.³⁸

	% Decisions with a Dissent	# Decisions with a Dissent	Total Decisions
Radovan Suchánek	0.79%	73	9185
Jan Filip	0.68%	61	9004
Josef Fiala	0.67%	50	7454
Kateřina Šimáčková	0.66%	53	8038
Jaroslav Fenyk	0.62%	18	2897
Milada Tomková	0.55%	13	2350
Vojtěch Šimíček	0.55%	46	8398
Vladimír Sládeček	0.52%	46	8882
Pavel Rychetský	0.50%	14	2773
Ludvík David	0.49%	43	8836
Pavel Šámal	0.43%	13	3003
Jan Musil	0.31%	17	5548
David Uhlíř	0.30%	24	7894
Jiří Zemánek	0.28%	27	9552
Jaromír Jírsa	0.21%	16	7769
Tomáš Lichovník	0.07%	6	8530

Table 1: A table showing the number of times a judge dissented and the number of times they were part of the bench deciding a case. The data encompass only the 2013–2023 third term of the CCC.

It appears that the importance of a case is another key aspect behind the decision whether to dissent. The factor of importance of a case is rather subjective, since the boundaries of importance of the individual case are partly dependent on the perception of the individual judges. There is not an objective definition that unites the undecided judges. Their views on which case is important differ:

“I think dissent is a fairly strong expression of disagreement, and often one disagrees over less substantive things. I think that dissent is meaningful if one is expressing a fundamental position or a fundamental opinion.”

³⁸ PAULÍK, Š. The Czech Constitutional Court Database. Journal of Law and Courts. 2024.

“It is really just supposed to be a question of legal opinion, strong legal opinion, not some kind of impressionology that I think something and it is a big question whether to bring into it the way of, for example, making that decision.”

“Really depends on the particular case. I distinguish the cases by how I perceive them, of course. There may be someone else who will say that this is more important than that. I judge it by what I think of it and if I then pay more attention to it, but that doesn’t mean I pay less attention to less important cases.”

“Well, that’s it, of course it’s less important. Even there they can create important things. That’s hard to say. I distinguish the dissents according to how I see them, of course. It can be someone else, they can simply say differently that it is not so important. I judge it by what I think about it and if I pay more attention to it, but that doesn’t mean that I don’t pay less attention to it.”

Despite the impossibility of discerning a pattern from the interviews that would reveal what judges consider as an important case, one insight is often repeated. That is that plenary cases are more influential in terms of social impact. As already mentioned, the CCC may repeal part of a law or even the entire law in a plenary decision. In contrast to that in the 3-member chamber cases the CCC decides on individual constitutional complaints.

“When it’s some principled matter of value especially in plenary cases. In the chamber decision I never dissent. Whether it’s about plenary or some core constitutional values, yeah I agreed with a colleague who felt the need to write the dissent that I would read it to consider whether or not to join in.”

“The plenary cases have a much greater significance and reach.”

V. DISCUSSION

Previous quantitative studies have shown that: 1) the higher the judge’s workload, the lower the probability that they will join a dissenting opinion³⁹; 2) the more legally complex and controversial the case, the more likely a judge is to dissent⁴⁰; or that 3) the likelihood of dissent is influenced by judges’ previous professional experience.⁴¹ The above mentioned findings are consistent with our qualitative findings. We further delve into a deeper insight into judges’ perceptions of the dissents.

The interviews revealed that the issue of workload is a big topic for all of the CCC judges. The overall caseload of the whole court has grown, with 94 % cases resulting in inadmissibility. The inadmissibility decisions are viewed by the judges as a necessary part of their job that takes the most time since these decisions must be reasoned and are on average 3-5 pages long. This leaves less time and energy to write dissents. Many judges criticized the necessity of a reasoning of the inadmissibility decisions and suggested that a form-style (or just a few sentences) dismissal would solve the time problem.⁴²

³⁹ EPSTEIN, L., LANDES, W. M., POSNER, R. A. The Behavior of Federal Judges; PAULÍK, Š., VARTAZARYAN, G. Disagreement on a Bench, p. 247; WITTIG, C. The Occurrence of Separate Opinions at the Federal Constitutional Court.

⁴⁰ PAULÍK, Š., VARTAZARYAN, G. Disagreement on a Bench, p. 247; EPSTEIN, L., LANDES, W. M., POSNER, R. A. Why (And When) Judges Dissent.

⁴¹ BRICKER, B. Breaking the Principle of Secrecy: An Examination of Judicial Dissent in the European Constitutional Courts. Law & Policy. 2017, Vol. 39, No. 2; GAROUPA, N., SALAMERO-TEIXIDÓ, L., SEGURA, A. Disagreeing in private or dissenting in public: An empirical exploration of possible motivations. European Journal of Law and Economics. 2022, Vol. 53, No. 2; KELEMEN, K. Judicial Dissent in European Constitutional Courts; WITTIG, C. The Occurrence of Separate Opinions at the Federal Constitutional Court.

The judges stressed the importance of the case as another factor influencing whether to dissent or not. They claimed that they simply sometimes perceived that some cases were more important for them than others, thus resulting in higher motivation for dissent: it could be a case that was related to their expertise, a politically important case, something where the applicant represents a group of people that the judge cares about, etc. In line with our quantitative findings, legally more complex or controversial cases fall into the category of cases that the CCC judges consider important.

Our findings also suggest that judges at CCC perceive differences in the dissenting behaviour of their peers due to different professional backgrounds. In particular, the difference between judges of the ordinary courts (for example Tomáš Lichovník, Jaromír Jirsa) and academics (Jan Filip) was highlighted, where a different approach to dissent was expected in the eyes of the judges (see for comparison the table 1). Quantitative comparative analysis of Constitutional courts in Germany, the Czech Republic, Poland, Slovakia and Latvia found that a higher rate of dissents is exercised by judges who have prior professional experience in the academy and the judiciary simultaneously.⁴³ For future research, it would be interesting to find out how different professional backgrounds affect the dissenting behaviour of judges.

An extremely specific and empirically unexplored topic are emotions as a factor influencing dissents. This opens up possibilities for further research – semantic analysis of dissents.⁴⁴ The judges themselves have admitted that they sometimes write dissents out of pure frustration, and this should be reflected in the dissent itself. There are sometimes explicitly offensive dissents.⁴⁵ It would be worth deeper research to find out when this happens. At the same time, it is logical to hypothesize, for future empirical research, that solitary dissents will be more emotionally colorful than joint dissents.⁴⁶

⁴² The role of clerks in unloading the judges presents an interesting issue: the number of court clerks can influence the probability of dissenting opinions or whether shorter reasoning of the inadmissibility decisions leads to more dissents. Moreover, every judge can have up to three full-time court clerks, including the option to offer part-time employment for up to six clerks in total. These can help reduce the load in the more run-of-mill type of decisions. The influence of clerks on the decision-making of the judges of the CCC is still an unexplored topic.

⁴³ BRICKER, B. Breaking the Principle of Secrecy, pp. 185–186.

⁴⁴ GOŹDŹ-ROSKOWSKI, S. Communicating dissent in judicial opinions: A comparative, genre-based analysis. International Journal for the Semiotics of Law- Revue internationale de Sémiotique juridique. 2020, Vol. 33, No. 2; STÁDNÍK, J. Umění nesouhlasu: disenty v kontextu legitimacy soudních rozhodnutí. Jurisprudence. 2021, No. 4, pp. 5–6.

⁴⁵ For example, the dissent to the decision of the CCC Pl. ÚS 44/17 of judges R. Suchánek, L. David, J. Fiala and J. Fenyk: The peak of arrogance is that the announcement of the ruling is just 19 hours after it was adopted (without, however, making the final text available to the judges), perhaps in order not to give the dissenting judges adequate space to write a dissenting opinion.

⁴⁶ It is interesting to see how judges deal with frustration when they have the opportunity to dissent and when they do not. Ongoing research at Charles University is examining the emotions of judges in the general court system (where dissents are not allowed). In one of the interviews a judge confessed that he breaks pencils under the bench in his chambers when he is outvoted. This supports the claim for deeper qualitative research in this area.

CONCLUSION

Our study has provided a deeper understanding of the dissenting behaviour of the CCC judges, drawing on a qualitative analysis of interviews with nine judges. We revealed that the decision to dissent is shaped by multiple factors, including professional background, emotional regulation, caseload, and the perceived significance of the case. Based on the identification-disagreement model, we grouped the judges into 3 clusters depending on their stance towards exercising a dissent: “haters”, “fans”, and “strategists”, each exhibiting distinct approaches to dissent based on their alignment with or opposition to the norm of consensus.

Our findings suggest that while some judges are guided by intrinsic and expressive utilities—motivated by personal values or the desire to showcase individuality—others prioritize reputational utility, aligning their behaviour with the court’s norm of consensus and their understanding of the role of a court. Additionally, we have discussed the dynamics of joint versus solitary dissent, with strategic considerations influencing the choice between collaborative and individual separate opinions. The introduction of chamber rotation has also altered the institutional context, by which the dissent is shaped at the CCC, reducing the long-term impact of collegiality costs and increasing the room for strategic consideration of the judges.

In summary, this study contributes to the broader discourse on judicial dissent and adds a more detailed insight to our previous large-n quantitative study. The main potential research avenue that the interviews opened is the question of what role does the emotional venting play in the decision whether to exercise or to avert a dissent.